

- As a quantitative trading research initiative, we have chosen not to publicly disclose the quantitative data points (figures). Instead, our GitHub provides a visual graphical representation of the model's outputs in the form of images.
- The historical data shown visually is not repainted, the underlying numerical data represented by each completed visual line (generated by data points) remains unchanged after the observation has been recorded.
- The model is not retrospectively altered, meaning we do not train the model on historical data, and so do not change the parameters to overfit the performance. Solely because we do not believe in pattern or market condition repetition.

This document shows our combined use of quantitative models' sample of 20 independent backtests covering 9 trading days in this document. The complete set of 20 backtests, including the graphical representation of the model's outputs and underlying data points, can be viewed on our GitHub.

In this document, we are showing results of short-term models, however we do have long-term models as well.

METHODOLOGY — how these results were produced

Out-of-sample only

Every backtest is run on a period of market data the models have not seen during development. No result in this report comes from data the model was tuned against, so no overfitting.

Rolling windows

The 20 backtests are individual days, and the user should refer to the images in the GitHub to investigate further. The model is repeatedly tested on fresh data rather than judged on a single snapshot.

Point-in-time data

Each run only uses information that would have actually been available on the day of each prediction, avoiding lookahead into future data or later restatements.
